“The most important thing is to have a clear idea of what you want to do,” says Dr. Srinivasan. “If you have a clear idea, then you can work towards it.”

12. Although Koh Ker itself is now little more than a collection of ancient ruins, the surrounding area is still a mix of traditional and modern life. In one village we stopped at a small shop where a local woman was making traditional rice paper. As such, she had no electricity or running water, so the shop was lit by a single kerosene lamp and the rice paper was made by hand over a large wok.

Afterwards we were invited to have a taste of the rice paper, which was served with a delicious dipping sauce. It was a simple meal, but it was clear that the woman had put a lot of effort into it. We were also given some rice paper to take away with us, which was a nice gesture.

Afterwards we continued our journey through the countryside, passing through several more villages and small towns. The landscape was a mix of lush green fields and dry, brown earth. The roads were dirt tracks, and there were many potholes and puddles. The sky was clear and blue, with a few wispy clouds.

We stopped for a break at a small roadside cafe. The menu was limited, but we chose some sandwiches and a cold drink. The sandwiches were simple, but the coffee was strong and delicious. After our break, we continued on our journey, passing through more of the same landscape. The roads were getting better, but there were still many potholes and puddles.

We eventually arrived at our destination, a small town called Koh Ker. The town was built on the site of an ancient Khmer temple complex. The town was very small, with only a few buildings and a few people. The town was very quiet, and there was a sense of peace and tranquility. After our break, we continued on our journey. The landscape was changing, with more trees and less open land. The roads were getting better, and there were fewer potholes and puddles. The sky was clear and blue, with a few wispy clouds.

Khmer culture

Khmer culture is very rich and diverse. The people are friendly and welcoming, and they have a deep respect for their history and traditions. The language is unique, and the people are very proud of their heritage.

Several individuals are standing near it, some appearing to be inspecting or working on it. The background shows a grassy area and some trees, suggesting an outdoor event like a motorcycle rally.
